Through the Institute for Social Transformation, we’re building relationships among academics, community partners, and policymakers and activating the potential of research as a foundation for transformative change.”

—KATHARYNE MITCHELL, DEAN OF SOCIAL SCIENCES

Social transformation is a collective process that promotes systemic change in institutions, social relationships, and values. Our approach utilizes three main strategies.

Convene Thought Leaders: We host speakers, conferences, workshops, and public events that draw community activists, scholars, and influencers who are working to build engagement pathways with policymakers.

Support Collaborative Interdisciplinary Research: The institute fosters a changemaker culture across campus by forging boundary-crossing partnerships among faculty, students, and staff. We link with community partners to offer insights into their most pressing questions and curate resources that support activism.

Catalyze Innovative Scholarship: We invest in faculty and students who bring new ideas to long-standing problems. The institute organizes faculty research workshops and provides grant funding for projects with transformative potential.
As part of our efforts to support innovative scholarship, the Institute for Social Transformation operates four main funding programs.

CATALYZE AWARDS
In the first three years of this program alone, we’ve awarded 34 faculty fellowship grants totaling $250,000 that have launched new collaborations, developed promising research projects, and boosted research visibility and stakeholder engagement.

EMERGING SCHOLAR SUPPORT
$5,000 grants support faculty working toward tenure or establishing themselves as leading scholars in their fields by accelerating book manuscript preparation and other influential publications.

BUILDING BELONGING
Over the next five years, we will support up to 500 first-generation, low-income, under-represented students through $1,500 research fellowships and faculty mentorship.

GLOBAL AND COMMUNITY HEALTH WELLBEING AWARDS
As many as 10 students per year will receive awards of up to $1,000 to conduct research with community health organizations, both locally and globally.

OUR INITIATIVES
As part of our efforts to foster interdisciplinary transformative research, the Institute for Social Transformation supports multiple collaborative research initiatives.

Solidarity Economics
This partnership with the University of Southern California proposes solutions for reshaping the economy in a way that addresses inequality and promotes mutuality.

Right Livelihood College
We house the only North American affiliate of the Right Livelihood Award Foundation, which connects students and faculty with international human rights and environmental leaders.

Public Interest Technology University Network (PIT-UN)
We’re part of a network of 36 colleges and universities offering curriculum, career development, funding, and experiential learning to help students develop and apply technology for the benefit of society.

Global and Community Health
Faculty from all across campus are studying the medical, environmental, and social determinants of health and developing two new undergraduate programs.

SEACoast
Monthly seminars and collaborative research build an interdisciplinary understanding of the role of social and environmental forces in coastal Southeast Asia.

Campus + Community
This center coordinates and promotes community-engaged scholarship and research activities with nonprofit organizations and local governments.

New Gen Learning
Faculty and graduate students collaborate on inclusive teaching strategies that leverage cultural strengths of children from historically underserved populations.

Urban Environment & Justice
Monthly meetings generate dialogue among faculty working at the intersection of urban development, environmental sustainability, and social justice.
